DIRECTOR'S NOTES

What is the nature of salvation? Do humans need to be overtly saved by an external being such as a guardian angel, or are we able to save ourselves if we're shown the light? These are the questions we explore in Floyd Dell's play. In times like this when so many feel like they have no control over their lives, Dell's play is an encouraging reminder that salvation is still attainable. I hope you enjoy the show.

Roxie Kooi, Director, The Angel Intrudes

"Cocaine" was written by Pendleton King in 1921. Set at 4am in the late summer of 1916, it shows the struggle between Nora, a 30-year old prostitute, and Joe, a 24-year old washed-up prizefighter. Both are addicted to cocaine and are living together in an attic flat on their last dime in the Village. As both come to a point in the show that they contemplate their lives by turning on the gas, Joe finally turns the gas off and looks out the window to realize the sun has come up. They will live another day. The play examines the limits a person will go to in order to keep their humanity and relationship. This show is one that will push your sense of how far a person would go to stay sane and the importance of remembering what it means to be a human struggling to survive.

Mary Katherine Simons, Director, "Cocaine"

Life and Death are a major part of the lives of human beings. One follows the other and it all depends on the Fates on whether one will live or die. In the play "The Game" by Louise Bryant the randomness of the Fates are at their peak. Life, played by Sandra Blum, and Death, played by Stephanie Storer, are by law expected to play a game of dice. They try to test the Fates playing elements in order to win the lives of our two human characters Cailin, played by Meagan Fairchild, and Owain, played by Ken Scotsfield. I was drawn to this play because of the natural inclination to test the Fates that all human beings have. We want to live without rules yet find often enough that the winds of change blow as easily as rolling a set of dice. The only message I can definitely dictate to you within this play is that Life may triumph, yet Death is still lurking behind the shadows. Watch the play and see just where your loyalties lie; with life or with death. Who will win, in the end?

Kaylee Smith, Director, The Game
